In the course of a study to explain the very low average thermal perceptions of hunter-gatherer populations, the peak body temperature achieved during a cold-water immersion test was analysed in conjunction with subjective estimates of perceived temperature. A significant correlation was found between the peak body temperature and the perceived temperature of the water. A similar correlation between peak body temperature and the temperature one is most comfortable in was also found. Analysis indicated that the peak body temperature was determined by the water temperature and the depth of the immersion. Multiple regression analysis revealed that the peak body temperature was not controlled by the perceived temperature, but was determined by immersion depth and, to a lesser degree, the water temperature. The simplest explanation for this correlation is that the peak body temperature determines the perceived temperature of the body and not the other way around. This can be a problem for estimators of the comfort threshold.Q: I have to add a new tag here, should I use questions or tags Is there any difference between asking How can I add the css tag? than What is the difference between css and javascript? A: A question asking what a tag is shouldn't have that tag. Tags are meta data about the question, not the question. Any other sorts of questions about what to put into a tag should be deleted. If the question is about what tags are appropriate for the question asked, then it's fine. If it is off-topic, see the FAQ. A: For the purpose of tag synonymization, questions should be tagged with the tag they should be tagged with. If they need to be re-tagged, they should be re-tagged with the tag they actually need to be tagged with. There is no practical way to check whether a question should be tagged with a specific tag, which is what the other question is asking. Tagging software does not infer
