After this update to Windows

10, the compatibility with third-party programs is not guaranteed. This may cause problems, such as the inability of games or graphics programs to work properly and the errors with the use of certain programs. There are various reasons to explain the incompatibility of third-party programs with Windows 10 - mainly because Microsoft is continuously releasing updates to the operating system, it involves each of them in the work of fixing bugs, thus the compatibility with external programs is inevitably affected in some way. Usually the users of third-party programs are aware of possible incompatibilities and are constantly on the lookout for the appearance of this problem. If it's not possible to identify and deal with this automatically, then developers can write special algorithms to detect bugs and find out what causes them. The latest version of a popular portable program is surely going to have some compatibility problems with the new version of Windows 10, but they can be solved very quickly and simply. For example, an update should always be downloaded, rather than the installation of a new version.

After update you will automatically be redirected to the new page of the program "Quick Update". Here you can automatically update all applications installed on your device. Another way is to change your Windows 10 settings and select the "Settings" icon, after which you should click on the "Update and security" tab. While updating you can choose what version of the program you want to use. PE-Viewer (Pe File Viewer) is a little utility to help you view and analyze PE files. It has some useful features, such as recursive importing, exporting functions in a single PE file. The program doesn't require any complicated installation, it just has to be dropped in any directory. The windows version includes the command line usage and an easy to use GUI interface. The program will use default settings from the Windows registry when available. PE-Viewer is 100% freeware and does not pose any threat to your computer. The program will open
