WARNING: there may not be enough RAM for the program to load other things into memory. Out of memory problems can cause programs that were normally robust to fail with strange errors. For example, a program that would have worked perfectly in a system with 256 megabytes of RAM may instead fail with error messages from the operating system that it has run out of memory. The DDE linker (BLD1) will usually ask if you want to run the DEMO program, or give you the chance to define your own. This can be achieved using the EDU command, using the -DEMO linker flag to change your build. See how-to-set-up-BIN-link-compilation-options In .NET, a method is a signature - a formal definition of how to communicate with the class implementing it. This allows you to evolve a class independently from other sources. You can separate many classes from a BIN, then define them later. This is how you can use the same class for two separate projects. When you build the program you will only need to produce DLL, not EXE. In these DLL you can have an interface to other source code. In C# this works by generating a public interface. If your interface generated code is a header file, consider having the interface in a separate header file. You can see where you need to change the interface when you are building/compiling the second project. If you cannot change the interface then the next best thing is to add to the interface later. If you want to make changes to the interface, you will need to wait for the first project to be updated (E.G. released a new version of the code) before doing so. The interface allows you to make changes in BIN files (Programs) without having to worry about the interface code. BIN files can be made up of any number of functions and classes. Functions are the main way you will make changes to the code. 82138339de
