According to Gamespot, representatives from the company were spotted at a recent meeting where they approached a journalist about the possibility of cutting the game from the line-up, in exchange for the fee. The journalist refused to elaborate on the conversation, saying only that there was no plan to quit the franchise. We've reached out to Ubisoft to see if the company has any comment on the purported report and will update if we receive a response. Assassin's Creed III shipped just over 200,000 units during its first week on the market. The game has received mostly positive reviews from critics, winning more than 100 awards worldwide. "We have always said that if we make the best game, we'll keep making it," said Ubisoft CEO Yves Guillemot in an interview with Gamespot. "If it doesn't sell well, we'll either make a sequel, or we will not. The latter might also be a good thing in a way because it will mean that the games we make will stand out and will be enjoyed by a larger audience. We'll see how that comes along."
