practiced in the ancient period, but that the Unani medicine was developed later. However, many commentators, including the Charak Samhita's authors, such as Pingree, Shloka, Dubois, and Polack, do not state that "Ayurveda" and "Unani medicine" were developed in the ancient period, but believe that they were developed by Buddhists during the medieval period. Unani medicine was developed by the people of the Middle East, particularly the Abbasid dynasty, and spread to India through the way of translation and the work of the scholars of the Islamic Golden Age. Although medieval Muslim writers recorded much of the history of Unani medicine they are not considered reliable sources due to their Islamic background and their intention of rejecting Christian and Judaic medicine. Origin The earliest mention of medicine in Indian writings dates to 3000 BC. The earliest clear description of a system of medicine, the Charak Samhita, was written around the 3rd century AD in Sanskrit. It recommended the use of Charaka, the author's medical system, in the late Medieval era. Then a man named Baba Ram Chandra (13th century) found Ayurvedic medicines in Persian works 1cb139a0ed
