If you work for a financial institution, you've probably noticed that volume of banking transactions increases for several months of the year as summer turns into fall. Then, the volume decreases throughout the holiday season as the year comes to an end and everyone is focused on financial activities associated with tax filings and moving forward into the new year. When this happens, some people may become uneasy about putting money in or taking money out of their accounts. It's easy to get that person to take out his or her regular amount from the ATM or add the amount to the credit card account, but more often than not, they don't follow through and keep their money in the account. As a result, the end of the year sees a significant drop in the volume of banking transactions. This may lead to sluggish or even negative growth in bank accounts throughout the year. One of the best ways to increase your bank account value is to have some kind of a savings account. That way, you're not only saving for the potential purchase of big-ticket items, but you're also making regular deposits to your account, which can grow your money faster. But, for some people, the thought of saving or contributing to an investment account is more problematic than simply getting rid of or adding money to their accounts. One of the best way to entice them to do so is by providing them a new savings incentive. There are many different types of incentives offered by financial institutions. Some offer discounts or rewards on other products or services, some offer you a chance to win a prize, or some allow you to earn or withdraw more money. Whatever incentive you have, you need to build it into your strategy for customer satisfaction. If you help your customers feel more comfortable with your products or services, you're more likely to have them keep coming back. We've put together a list of 13 tips that you can implement to help increase the value of your bank accounts. Try one or two each week or use all of them and you'll see a big difference in the end of the year. The most conspicuous change following adhesion of human epithelial cells to extracellular matrix (ECM) proteins or cells is a change in expression of sialyl Lewis x, a glycosylation motif that comprises the Le(x) antigen. Le(x) is a terminal sugar structure that has recently been shown to play a critical role in cell-cell adhesion. In the present study, three melanoma cell lines exhibiting either Le(x)-bearing and Le(x)-negative phenotypes, as well as epithelial cells, were examined regarding the cell-surface expression and functional significance of Le(x) in cell-cell adhesion and migration. Using soluble carbohydrate-binding ligands, WGA-A and P-selectin, we found that Le(x) was responsible for the cell-cell adhesion and the immobilization of Le(x)-bearing cells. Stimulation of Le(x)-bearing cells by a selective sialyl Lewis x carbohydrate antigen lig
