LONGMONT -- The Boulder City Council on Thursday morning is expected to consider entering into a stipulated settlement with the city's lawyers that would require them to admit liability in a lawsuit brought by a City Council member who says the Boulder City Council violated his constitutional rights. Saying the case was "troubling" and one that was "fairly unique," Deputy City Attorney Stephen Kaufman said Thursday afternoon that a confidential settlement memorandum reached by the attorneys' and a council member's legal representatives would serve as the council's consent-to-admit order, a document he said would acknowledge the city lawyers' liability. The council has several days to approve the settlement, which requires that the council members not be named in the action, Kaufman said. Council members will debate the proposal and then vote on it, which should be a formality unless a council member objects, Kaufman said. A possible objection is why just one council member and not the council, he said. Kaufman said no settlement offer was made to the council member, and he would not say the amount of the settlement. He said it was set in a confidential agreement between the council member's lawyers and the city attorneys. "We filed, the council filed, the council joined the council member in filing the lawsuit. It was what's called a Bivens-type lawsuit, so we're admitting liability," Kaufman said. "The council member, they asked us to file a motion to withdraw the case, and we tried to file that, but before we could do that, the council member asked us to withdraw it." Kaufman said the legal agreements were reached last month, but a
