Preamp Emulator uses saturable transformers to recreate the effect of preamp tubes. Using saturable transformers allows the sound engineer to set the amount of distortion or saturation that will be applied, while the input audio signal is passed through the circuit. This is achieved by applying a series of gains to the input signal. The amount of saturation is defined by changing the values of the input signal by applying a variable value of saturation. When the input signal is mixed with the saturated output signal, the result will resemble the sound of a real amplifier or preamp tubes. Key Features
