I'd like to see all of you appreciate my little creation. I've been beta testing it on my realm and it's pretty flesible, as long as you understand how. It already has a pretty big big system call of objects and textures and stuff in. I'd like to see all of you appreciate my little creation. I've been beta testing it on my realm and it's pretty flesible, as long as you understand how. It already has a pretty big big system call of objects and textures and stuff in. The triple helix is a high-order structural motif which has drawn much interest due to its role in a variety of biologically important structures. Four different triple helix types exist: antiparallel, parallel, and two types of mixed-parallel.

The mixed-parallel is of particular interest because it permits the two polymeric strands to be in a sandwich arrangement with one facing the other, yielding a structure which possesses a relatively large internal cavity. This cavity can be used to specifically solubilize compounds of use in a number of therapeutic applications. Further, these compounds can be selectively and reversibly bound with a "nonintercalating" agent such as an oligonucleotide. Many active agents are known for therapeutic applications. However, problems arise when these active agents are encapsulated into nanoparticles. Specifically, the observed melting temperatures (T.sub.m) of these nanoparticles are well below the organismal range, causing the active agent to prematurely desolvate prior to reaching the nucleus of the cell. Therefore, a need exists to stabilize the encapsulated agent in order to slow the release rate and thereby prolong the lifetime of the nanoparticles within an organism.;
