Frequent abnormality in the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis of patients with systemic lupus erythematosus. It has long been recognized that the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis in patients with systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) may be dysfunctional. To address the issue of specificity of this dysfunction, we studied the HPA axis of 10 SLE patients, six patients with other autoimmune diseases and 15 normal control subjects in response to 1 mg dexamethasone (DEX) and insulin hypoglycemia testing. The results of all subjects in the three groups were comparable. To assess the effects of disease activity, we repeated the DEX stimulation testing in SLE patients who were in a remission phase of their illness and in an active phase. There were no significant differences between the SLE patients in remission and the normal control subjects in both tests, but a significant increase in the DEX level in the active SLE patients was noted, compared to that in the normal control subjects ($P = 0.05$). In the SLE patients in remission, an exaggerated decline in cortisol levels at 30 min after administration of DEX was observed, compared to the normal control subjects (P less than 0.01). These results show that the patients with SLE have an augmented HPA response and a blunted ACTH response to DEX compared to normal control subjects. This abnormal response to DEX or insulin hypoglycemia may be a cause of the chronic hypercortisolism noted in some patients with SLE.
