In 2012, a conservative Republican, Gov. Jerry Brown, defeated former Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a moderate Republican whose tax hikes at the end of his term made him toxic to the electorate. Brown, a Democrat, could win re-election in 2014, but speculation is that he will face a challenge from the right. With the new GOP majorities in the Senate and House, there's little doubt that California will keep its status as a national leader in conservative policymaking. For many of the state's conservatives, it's hard to imagine the state with a liberal governor, and even many liberals look with envy at the state's conservative politicians. For conservatives, the question is whether they should support Gov. Brown in the presidential primary in 2016. If California were a liberal state, the attitude toward the incumbent governor would be quite different. Gov. Brown has a long record of progressive policy making—he's the highest ranking elected official in the nation to call for cuts in Social Security and Medicare—and he would likely be seen as a progressive. But California is not a liberal state; it is, as Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., likes to say, "the sleeping giant," and its electorate has not had a popular progressive in decades. Gov. Brown's support among Democrats in the 2008 election was high, but his support among independents and Republicans was much higher, and he won the election. No Democrat has won California since the Watergate Era. Gov. Brown is a moderate, not a progressive, and many conservatives are not happy about that. Some will vote for him in 2016, but many will not. Republican Attorney General Kamala Harris is a Democrat. This could keep the governor from e79caf774b
