If I ever meet the genius who thought, "Let's see what happens if we combine two of the worst movie cliches in existence and drag the result out into the movie industry." that man deserves my undying respect and gratitude. That being said, there's something about this film that feels a little bit familiar. Sure, the "nobleman" trope is cliché, but, as far as I can tell, the hero was well played by William Baldwin. No one else is so good and the rest of the cast feels like bad soap star wannabes that go nowhere. The villain(s) is the right pace as well. Not perfunctory or implausible, but not particularly engaging. The plot is weak as well. After seeing the trailer, I knew exactly what was going to happen, but when it actually happened, I was surprised. It was like a chess move that I knew from the beginning, but it seemed like I was seeing it for the first time. I'm glad I saw it and that I got to see how much better the other than Gen e79caf774b

It is pitched similarly to a clarinet or oboe, with a key which could be shifted. However, while both of these instruments have a key which can be moved and makes the sound pitch follow the position of the body, in a Dokshin the key is fixed in one position. The body of the instrument is constructed of a tube made of clay, which has a mouthpiece at one end. It is believed to be an ancestor of the barrel-harp, which was invented in the 18th century. One of the earliest known mention of the instrument was in a 1550 document. An early example of the instrument is housed in the Istanbul Museum of Applied Arts.
