In the practice of the invention, a particular use of the laminate, which is that in the form of a strip, is described by way of example. The invention more especially relates to a laminate in the form of a transfer paper for printing and copying machines and also to a process of its production. Because the printing and copying machines are already widely used, there is a need for replacing, in order to do away with the use of halftone papers, the conventional silver halide films. The halftone printing and the copying methods do, however, give rise to problems with the inks. The inks are in fact numerous and differ from one another in particular in the type of binders. The choice of binders is often dictated by the machine to be used. Even if the paper used has suitably close properties to the printing or copying machine to be used, it is often not possible to set a standard for all the different printing and copying machines that can be used in the future.
