Artificial neural networks are mathematical models that employ one or more layers of interconnected “neurons” to perform tasks. Each neuron is capable of performing simple set operations, such as logical AND, logical OR, and non-linear transfer functions, on its input and is capable of fully or partially relaying its calculated output to other neurons, called “pre-synaptic neurons.” The strength of the connection between each neuron and its pre-synaptic neurons is typically referred to as “weight.” Over time, the connection weights of a neural network are “learned” by the network itself, through a process referred to as “back propagation of error.” A learning algorithm adjusts the connection weights such that the error between the output of the neural network and a desired output, is minimized. A neural network is typically comprised of 3 types of neurons: input neurons, output neurons, and “hidden neurons.” The neural network receives input from input neurons, processes the input, and generates an output that is then passed along to output neurons. Each input neuron is typically connected to a plurality of hidden neurons. Each hidden neuron is typically connected to a plurality of output neurons. In addition, an artificial neural network may include, among other things, a “dendritic arch,” “hidden layer” and “output layer.” The dendritic arch typically represents the inputs to the artificial neural network. The hidden layer is the layer of neurons between the inputs and the output. An output layer is the layer of neurons that is used to generate the actual outputs of the artificial neural network.

A “computer readable medium” or “media” is a physical device, such as a disk, hard drive, optical disk, or the like, that stores information that can be provided to a computer for processing. Typically, computer readable media stores data as instructions for processing a processor, which an apparatus may execute to perform the methods described herein
