Running program list and system registry can also be inspected, besides allowing you to alter settings if you think they should be altered. How to use Task Manager Keep in mind that Task Manager doesn't require an installer. To start Task Manager, right-click on the system tray and select Start Task Manager, which you can access from any location without clicking any toolbars. A program running in the background also appears in the Idle Processes area, but it can't be terminated from here. You need to use the system's Task Scheduler to stop it or alter its execution time, which means modifying the target file or removing the tool. Task Scheduler, which can also be launched from the "Start" menu, is where you can stop programs from running at the specified time, specify the action they are to perform, and specify whether it should run the program normally or in the background. If you want to close a program in the running list, all you have to do is right-click on it and select End Process. You can also terminate a
