The idea is to have an array of models that I can ask to do things and an observer that listens to the requests. It should be thread safe and fast. The problem is, what is the best way to organize the library and its client code? I need to know if the program should be thread safe and what the correct APIs should be. I will try to explain what I have and what I have tried so far, so I hope anyone can show me a better design.

Library The idea is to have several generic classes that take some parameters to run the calculations and provide a functionality to run a certain class that takes in a parameter. It will be a generic class for all the calculations I need to do in my application. The classes that are used by the API are in a different file. What I have done so far is to create an interface that will be implemented by all the classes. The implementations will be in one file and will be Thread safe. So far so good. The API handles the daemon update in the observer and starts the requested task.

The Observers Here is the problem. I have several models that I want the API to update. I have the Model classes and the request classes. When the observer registers it gives the Model class that it wants to update the object on and the request class. I have noticed that if the model is already updated, the observer will call the same request d0c515b9f4
