Lightroom If your images include anything of the digital or natural variety (landscapes, architectural photography, or even snapshots), then Lightroom is the software you should be looking into. Lightroom offers a more intuitive user interface and better video-editing and play-back capabilities. The last few iterations of Lightroom have made the program very easy to use. The name is now derived from the fact that you control your image using a collection of individual folders, where each folder contains a specific type of file. You may wonder why, when you have a family portrait photo, you use your external hard drive to store a separate folder with just photos of your kids, and another folder with just images of your parents. This is because you are viewing all your files with Lightroom. Another reason is that as a photographer, you have many reasons to view a collection of files. For example, you may want to select only your best shots or help your clients tell the story of their wedding in a small number of photographs. You can also use Lightroom to perform the following tasks with images you've saved in your digital camera: Correct and retouch images: You can easily correct flaws and problems within images. You can also adjust brightness, contrast, and color. If you select multiple images, you can apply the same adjustments to all of them. Because Lightroom is also a video-editing program, you can manipulate your video footage just as you would retouch your photos. Create a slideshow: You can create a slideshow from images in a single folder or from all your photos. It's super easy to add music to your slideshow, and you can add transitions to your slide shows. Slide shows are super handy for families whose kids are obsessed with songs or for any photographers who take events and need to impress their clients with the quality of their images. You can even incorporate your Lightroom settings into your slideshows by providing titles and captions. Create a print: If you want to make your image the full resolution of a print, you can do so

Q: Why does `to_json` change the type? {:@record,[{:foo,1},{:foo,2}]} => {:@record=>[{:foo=>1}, {:foo=>2}]} I would have expected [{:foo=>1}, {:foo=>2}] But then I tried to_json and things get a bit weird: {:@record,[{:foo,1},{:foo,2}]} => "{"@record":[{"foo"=>1},{"foo"=>2}]}" Why? A: to_json is not the same as to_s. In your example: {:@record,[{:foo,1},{:foo,2}]} => {:@record=>[{:foo=>1}, {:foo=>2}]} to_json([{:foo,1}, {:foo,2}]) => "{"@record":[{"foo"=>1},{"foo"=>2}]}" to_s([{:foo,1}, {:foo,2}]) => "{:foo=>1, :foo=>2}" A: In Ruby, to_s is overloaded to work for some built-in types like " String", " Bignum", and " Fixnum", so... to_s representation of Fixnum is the same as its default representation, i.e. it is " 0" to_s representation of Bignum is " 0b00000011" ...and this is why the output of both of the examples above is {:foo=>1}. However, to_json has a different default representation for non-primitive types -- i.e. Objects. Intravenous injection of an activated factor X-specific prothrombinase inhibitor does not promote thromboembolism or systemic hypercoagulability after stroke. The two most promising agents for the prevention of thromboembolic events in patients with ischemic stroke have been the platelet GP IIb/IIIa receptor antagonist and the prothrombinase inhibitor. Thrombin-specific agents may be superior to non-specific inhibitors. We therefore compared the risk of thromboembolic events, including stroke, after intravenous injection of pro

The aim of this study was to investigate the relationship of heart rate to T-wave peak interval (TpI) during exercise. We have found linear correlation between heart rate and TpI during exercise. Mean measured TpI and heart rate during exercise showed a lower and higher tendency, respectively. In general, TpI-heart rate relationship was small and shallow during exercise. This may be due to the large physiologic variations in maximal heart rate and central venous pressure, which in turn is dependent on the degree of venous congestion, and a pathological increase in resting heart rate as observed in hypertensive patients.Veles, Šentrupert Veles (;) is a village in the Municipality of Šentrupert in the northern part of the Upper Carniola region of Slovenia.
