Lightroom is a digital-camera-based program that works similarly to Photoshop. In fact, the features are so similar that it's often tempting for professionals who are already proficient in Photoshop to start using Lightroom instead, because it works almost the same way. Learning Lightroom is not nearly as difficult as learning Photoshop, so many people decide that Lightroom is a great alternative. However, Lightroom is designed more for photographers who take a few good pictures a year, whereas Photoshop is for professionals who do thousands of pictures a year and require extensive features in their products. The features and usability of Lightroom are similar to Photoshop, but the interface is a little more laid-back. Use Adobe Bridge to assemble and organize your images. Bridge is a part of both Photoshop and Lightroom. Some people believe that Lightroom simply adds the features to Photoshop that Lightroom doesn't have, but that's not the case. Because of the layout and functionality of Lightroom, the purpose of Lightroom is to give you more options, more efficiently. For example, you can use Lightroom to quickly edit an image so that you can get it into a finished state in a matter of minutes. In contrast, in Photoshop, you have to do it one layer at a time. Photoshop and Lightroom both enable you to create multiple layers, manipulate them, and combine them. You can also use any combination of both to create and enhance imagery.

Nelson and his team of engineers at the Tesat Group have been developing the car's advanced drive systems and computer systems since October 2014. These specialist systems mean the Vision could run by itself, without a driver, coasting down the Autodromo di Monza. It took just seven months to develop the electrically powered car, the ultimate goal of the project being to build a reliable self-drive vehicle that could drive itself in traffic and down motorways. It's notable that the Vision's designers were flexible to allow for future autonomous driving development. "It's a vehicle that we are going to need in the future, as autonomous technology develops. If it does happen that we need a car with no driver, we have the technology that can deliver such a vehicle now," said Nelson. "The future is not too far away." When you purchase a Lamborghini and you take delivery of it, there is the day you get your first driver's licence and the day you take it out on the road. The same should apply to this self-drive car, and Nelson is confident that it will. "It won't be three days before you are on the road," said Nelson. He also added that the drive systems were all designed and built in-house. The Vision is not just a concept; it has been developed into a functioning vehicle by a group of engineers at the Tesat Group in Monaco, as part of the Renault-Nissan Alliance. But unlike Tesla's Elon Musk, who seems to have the world at his fingertips, Nelson is a little more humbled, with no visions of Elon Musk-level wealth and fame for him, but rather, a simple future he seeks to bring about.
