The purpose of this study was to determine the nutritional intake of adults with Prader-Willi syndrome (PWS). Previous studies have suggested that adults with PWS may be at risk of various complications due to poor eating habits, such as nutritional rickets. This study was conducted in three phases. Phase I: a retrospective chart review of 34 adults with PWS was conducted to determine the average length of hospitalization; care costs; frequency of PWS-related complications and nutritional intake, defined by nutritional goals for adolescents and adults; and, most importantly, the actual nutritional intake. Phase II: a retrospective cross-sectional study of 141 adults with PWS was conducted to determine the role of PWS and growth in the prevalence of obesity. Phase III: a prospective study was conducted to determine the relationship between nutritional intake and activity status in a population of adults with PWS living in the community. The average length of hospitalization was 46+/-24 days. Of the 34 patients reviewed in Phase I, only one reported having a PWS-related complication. Despite the PWS-related morbidity, patients have a good nutritional intake (total energy intake = 2,049+/-1,266 kcal/day; percentage of calories from fat = 31.9+/-6.0%). Only 15.9% of patients have a body mass index (BMI) > or = 25 kg/m(2), 30.4% have a BMI between 18 and 24.9 kg/m(2), and 54.3% of patients have a BMI or = 25 kg/m(2) and patients with BMI
