Business Communication - Concepts, Cases, and Applications. The value of pulmonary perfusion scanning using air and blood gas analysis in detecting late postoperative pulmonary embolism. Although the finding of a wedge-shaped perfusion defect on two-dimensional echocardiography (2DE) is highly specific for the diagnosis of pulmonary embolism (PE), the true prevalence of late PE following major abdominal surgery is unknown. We performed an evaluation of clinically suspected cases of late PE following major abdominal surgery to quantify the prevalence and the clinical utility of 2DE using air ventilation-perfusion (V/Q) scans in this setting. Fifty-one patients who underwent major abdominal surgery with suspected postoperative PE underwent 2DE, right heart catheterization (RHC), and a V/Q scan. A perfusion defect on 2DE was correlated with pulmonary artery pressure (PAP) and findings on RHC. There were three patients (5.9%) with documented late PE. All patients with late PE had wedge-shaped perfusion defects on 2DE and elevated PAP, which was in agreement with the finding of pulmonary infarction on RHC. In 1 of these 3 patients, the V/Q scan failed to detect PE. Five of 45 (11.1%) patients with a wedge-shaped defect on 2DE had elevated PAP (> 25 mm Hg). These 5 patients had no clinical symptoms and normal RHC. The findings on 2DE did not change the clinical management. The true prevalence of late PE in patients after major abdominal surgery is approximately 5%. Although a wedge-shaped perfusion defect seen on 2DE is highly specific for the diagnosis of PE, 2DE cannot reliably rule out clinically significant late PE. A V/Q scan may be required in selected patients with isolated findings of pulmonary infarction on 2DE.
