My company uses a custom, non-standard, web browser that renders webpages differently than Google Chrome. For some reason, the checkboxes the custom web browser is using are greyed out. Also, if the checkbox is greyed out, then the text that goes with it in that section of the page is not visible. A: Your HTML editor didn't format the HTML as it should be. The attribute you are looking for is attribute=value;. In particular, if you inspect the element in your browser you should see something like: In the case of your sample, you would get something like this: Notice how one of the two lines has a blank space between the disabled and="" text. This is because the attribute selector does not equal this. To fix this problem, your web browser must have a program or extension that formats/sanitizes HTML. If not, your work will be difficult because you will not be able to tell if there is a problem until your site loads and the text is not visible.
