Games are the most popular kind of media that young people consume. They have a large potential to reach young people, and are often advertised and accessible to them. In this article, which is part of a series on global gaming, we discuss new ways of gaming in the digital age, covering new forms of entertainment and education, and the role of government in promoting and regulating new forms of gaming. The growth and rapid diffusion of gaming devices and new forms of gaming are not only transforming the industry, but also influencing public policy. New methods of distribution have transformed the global gaming industry. Gaming industry is expanding in many countries, and new gaming platforms and devices are being introduced. With media expansion comes economic growth and changes in employment. This has the potential to increase the number of people from different backgrounds, such as women, working in the gaming industry, particularly in the developing world. Nowadays companies are using the internet to reach younger audiences who are yet to be exposed to this type of media.

The growth of gaming and social media coverage through gaming has allowed game developers, movie studios, and multinationals to directly reach young people. This has enabled them to be proactive in terms of reaching out to a younger audience and influence public policy. Yet, the global gaming industry has relatively few policy makers, and they cannot address all the potential benefits and harms of gaming on their own. Governments can assist in the development of public policies to benefit from media diversification, in terms of both access to media and its content. Governments can also take a proactive approach to the regulation of gambling and gaming. They can have a role in combating harmful content, while establishing and enforcing national gambling and gaming regulations. Governments can also stimulate new forms of technological development and digital media diversification, which can contribute to a better understanding of young people and their lives. As the world continues to diversify, the role of government in facilitating positive social change and media diversification will continue to be important. Each country has a role to play in this process, which starts with examining their cultural and social contexts.
