Оффтопользование на одной платформе. Последнее решение. One of the most important structural components of the skull is the anterior cranial fossa. The border between the anterior cranial fossa and the frontal lobe has an elliptical shape. This type of morphology is a valuable contribution to the macroscopic appreciation of this structure. Once the presence of a venous congestion was confirmed, of the five sinuses involved (confluence, inferior sagittal, parietal, occipital sinuses, sphenoparietal) we will perform a contrast-enhanced tomographic study of the frontal sinus, its confluence, and the paranasal sinuses, either endoscopic or through an external puncture. If there is a penetration of this cephalic vein at the level of the cranial fossa, the reason must be a tumor. If, on the contrary, the pattern is a medio-lateral incrustation of the meningeal epithelium, then there is a venous stasis related to a disease. This study of the venous microcirculation of the anterior cranial fossa can be important in the process of diagnosing infectious or neoplastic lesions of the skull base. A venous malformation is more likely to be discovered in older patients, and is often present as a mass. It may be single or multiple, unilateral or bilateral. A simple venography is not enough. Indeed, it is a complex venous malformation with various components that converge to the inferior sagittal sinus. A high-
