To evaluate the effectiveness of three-dimensional (3D) printed dental implants. Four phantom models were made of pure titanium, cobalt-chromium alloy, stainless steel and polyether ether ketone (PEEK) with 3D scanner (scanLAB C00; EXA Corporation, Tokyo, Japan). Four models were randomly divided into: group A: 3D printed directly without sandblasting and group B: 3D printed with sandblasting followed by surface treatment with acid etching (50% phosphoric acid). The standard of evaluation was 1) the values of 3D model conformity to the original data; 2) the values of 3D model quality after finishing the surface treatment; 3) the values of the application of 3D printed dental implants to the clinical cases. 1) The values of 3D model conformity to the original data in group A were all higher than that in group B (P
