permanent repair and actually grows new cells. This new type of engineered skin is called scaffold-free skin. It doesn't require a skin graft to grow cells on your skin and doesn't require any surgery.

Instead, skin cells are grown in a lab, as we have seen in the video below. And like the cells that cover a real placenta, it heals itself and can even be cut without scarring.

What's the big deal? A central problem is regenerating skin. The standard treatments for serious damage require skin grafts from a living donor, either a cadaver or a living donor. There are several complications with living donor grafts. The donor is incised to harvest the graft, the recipient needs to be present for the graft to take, and sometimes the donor gets sick afterwards. Scaffold-free skin patches can be created in vitro, which eliminates the donor complications. This new study on using scaffold-free skin to treat burns has shown significant healing benefits. The bottom line Scaffold-free skin is far superior to current methods of treating burn wounds since it doesn't require surgery and it doesn't need a living donor. Since it's a patch made from cells grown in a lab, it provides a permanent repair with no donor site complications. While the current version of the scaffold-free skin patch only looks promising for small wounds, it's the first patch of this type, and new versions are being tested in lab. The process is still pretty new and more work has to be done to make it fully functional.

However, scaffold-free skin is already providing an important tool to treat burn and chronic wounds.

The University of California San Diego hopes to use the current version to heal massive burns or tumors without surgery.
