Migration is a vital component of development and wound repair in multicellular organisms. To investigate its molecular and cellular basis, a simple methodology is needed that reproducibly quantifies the movement of cells within a defined area over time. Using a manual photo-stop method, we found that migration velocity of corneal epithelial cells in SBM towards a serum-containing medium is approximately 2.2-2.5 times lower than that of fibroblasts under the same conditions. Cells migrating into a fibronectin-coated chamber had a velocity similar to that of fibroblasts. Establishing a semi-automated system to study cell migration, we found that the migration velocity of corneal epithelial cells in a fresh collagen matrix was higher than that in a fibronectin-coated chamber (2.5 vs. 2.0-2.2, respectively). Thus, collagen may be a better substrate for corneal epithelial cell migration than fibronectin in vivo./* Copyright The Kubernetes Authors.
