As a relatively new professor at the University of the Arctic, Heikki has taken a bold approach to his job duties as Department Chair of the Electrical and Computer Engineering Department. Rather than pretending that he knows everything, he's given his students the freedom to research and learn anything within the discipline. The University of the Arctic, situated on the beautiful North Slope of the Yucatan Peninsula in northern Canada, is a unique place. Their concept of a "community university" offers a unique set of specialized degree programs to students who might otherwise be forced to leave the country in search of an education. Housed on an 85-square mile campus, the University of the Arctic has 14,000 students representing every continent on the globe. The university has three colleges: College of Business, College of Engineering, and College of Science, as well as a residential college, Northwell. As the Department Chair of Electrical and Computer Engineering, it's Heikki's goal to provide his students with the type of education that he received at the University of Helsinki. Achieving this goal means allowing students to learn how to learn. Heikki aims to foster an environment in which his students can learn what they need to learn, instead of merely taking what is presented to them. "I think the common philosophy of the University of the Arctic is that we can best serve our students if we are guided by the belief that they can learn for themselves," says Heikki c6a93da74d
