What Marx meant was that religion is the opium of the people. Opium is a mild stimulant similar to caffeine. It serves as a mild energizer. It can motivate people to work harder and it can serve as a mind-numbing sedative. If one thing is certain about the right, it is that they love to work, and opium serves as an addictive stimulant that keeps them working. Opium has also served as an allurement in the minds of others. It draws people in by making them believe it will get them into heaven for all eternity. Even in the 21st century, opium continues to allure people because it promises them heavenly bliss for an eternity. Why does the right-wing use opium? Most likely they do not do so consciously. Given the conservative culture they grew up in, they may have simply internalized the idea that Christianity is the answer to all problems. If you want to work harder, you must pray, because that will give you the strength to produce more. If you are hungry, you must thank God for the food. If you need a new home, you need to ask God for a new house. If you want to eat, you need to go to church. No other crop has come to the surface of the consciousness of even the most conservative American adults more often than has the poppy. Underfoot in the middle of baseball games. On the roof of skyscrapers. On the dashboard of automobiles. Opium. For The Masses traces the romantic history, the political history, and the academic history of this most mysterious of plants. One of the greatest natural discoveries of all time, opium is the ultimate teacher. It is the supreme narcotic. It is a straight-up drug of pleasure. It is the perfection of the miraculous. It is the opium of the masses--from cover.
