Most of the time, cracking software is a good thing. It allows you to use a software product for free. If you don't like the product, you can simply uninstall it. However, there are some instances where cracking software isn't as beneficial. If you mess up, it can actually make things worse. You need to know your limitations and be careful when using cracking software. If you are not sure of your skills, you should not be cracking software. If you do crack software, you are taking a risk and are giving others the opportunity to steal your hard work. Never attempt cracking software if you don't know what you are doing. If you are unsure, just stick with installing it. After all, it's not that hard.

The Apple Pencil is definitely a great add-on to the image editing software. For starters, you can use a much finer detail than was available with previous styluses. In fact, the very fine detail you can now achieve with the Apple Pencil rivals that of the DWG or Carrara models. You can even turn on the line (line art) feature, which adds fine detail to the image in the exact same way. Apart from the most popular functions, this is particularly useful for adding textures to areas of a photograph and other images. The effect even shows up when zooming. Overall, the Apple Pencil works fine, but it is certainly not perfect. For example, the Apple Pencil has no pressure sensitivity. However, even so, I am confident that pressure sensitivity could have been added even to the iPad Pro, if and when that ever happens. That doesn't keep this little stylus from being of great benefit. Same old stuff: more and bigger brushes, 32-bit gradients, better gradients and even more. The default brush size now goes from 1 to 32 pixels and, unlike for Photoshop, the resolution also goes from 1 to 16 pixels. That's quite a bit more than when I last reviewed this application. Long pressing the + button in the tool bar for the 'adjuster' computes the right type of non-linear adjustment for the moment. And it will recompute on every screen-fit even if you went to another web page and came back. OK it isn't great but it's ok. That is when you have it in a 'standard' view without the 'viewer' distortions.
